

married. For the reception, the art-history major chose the Nasher Sculpture Center. She chose a white color scheme and added pops of summery orange—Matt's favorite color—with citrus.

There were personal touches throughout, from the watch Matt wore (a gift from her father) to Taylor's wedding-day jewelry (her grandmother and great-grandmother's). The groom's cake—a carton of milk surrounded by chocolate-chip cookies—was a nod to Matt's favorite nighttime snack.

After 10 months of planning, the big day arrived. This time, the rain steered clear, and their wedding day was picture perfect. "It turned out better than I would've even imagined," Taylor says. "It was really special for us. We took in every moment."

The party went on until almost midnight, at which point, the guests were ushered out to bid goodbye to the happy couple. But before they made their exit, Taylor and Matt enjoyed a private dance to "No One's Gonna Love You" by Band of Horses.

"Dancing together, after the whirlwind of the wedding day, in such a beautiful setting, was something that I will always remember," Matt says.

At that moment, though there were 200 friends and family members in attendance that night, it was as if they were the only two people there. D
